Background:

With the reputation of a world-class transport system, a major emphasis in Hong Kong has been the efficient movement of vehicle traffic. This approach, however, can often sacrifice the safety, convenience, and comfort of non-motorized road users. How do we balance the interests of different road users and entice people to walk longer before taking transport? If we aspire to the vision of building Hong Kong as a liveable city, are we giving enough priority to the needs of pedestrians? Do our networks offer excellent connectivity and accessibility, as well as quality spaces for all to enjoy social life? This event will be a valuable opportunity for you to explore these questions with the public sector, academia, and transport and planning professionals.
